

Don't Stress the Stress

Did You Know?

Everyone experiences feelings of sadness from time to time. However, when a sad mood lasts for two weeks or more, it may be clinical depression, a persistent and disabling illness that affects millions of Americans. Symptoms of clinical depression include:

- Sad moods
- Loss of pleasure or interest in activities you once enjoyed
- Feelings of helplessness or hopelessness
- Oversleeping or difficulty sleeping
- Difficulty concentrating
- Thoughts of death or suicide

Depression can often be treated successfully with a combination of antidepressant drugs and counseling. So, if you think you may be suffering from depression, see your doctor today.

Okay, so maybe we will never be able to completely eliminate stress from our lives, but there are ways we can minimize it and make it less – well, less stressful. One way is to manage your time better so you're not overwhelmed, running late, or catching up. The following are four ways you can better manage your time and eliminate stress from your day:

Make a time diary

It's difficult to make intelligent decisions about using your time more effectively if you don't know what you're doing with your time now.

Learn to say "no"

Once you've blocked time for important, but often not scheduled activities, sign on for only those things that are important to you, or your family, friends and health. Once you know exactly what you have time to do, turning down things that don't fit into your priorities is easier.

Create a time-based, to-do list

Lists are always helpful, and adding how much time each task should take helps prioritize how you go about the tasks. When you prioritize tasks you naturally focus on those that you can do immediately.

Don't be a perfectionist

Set rational goals. It's fine to strive to be your best, but it's counterproductive to try to be the very best. Setting unattainable expectations of yourself just adds stress to your life.

Can You Recognize an Alcohol Problem?

Like cancer or heart disease, alcoholism is a chronic disease with its own symptoms and causes. The disease is progressive and can be fatal if not treated. In fact, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention lists alcohol abuse as the third leading preventable cause of death in the United States.

According to the National Council on Alcoholism and Drug Dependence (NCADD), you may have an alcohol problem if:

- You have experienced problems on the job, with the law or with your family because of your drinking.
- You look forward to a set time in the day when you can start drinking.
- You worry that alcohol won't be available when you want it.
- You periodically try to slow down or stop drinking.

- You sometimes have a drink in the morning to steady your nerves or get rid of a hangover.
- You experience symptoms of withdrawal (such as nausea, sweating, shakiness and anxiety) if you quit drinking.
- Friends, family members and/or others have talked to you about your drinking.

If you think you may have an alcohol problem, get help and support. Turn to resources such as your Primary Care Physician, Employee Assistance Program or local chapter of Alcoholics Anonymous. You can also contact the NCADD toll-free at 800.NCA.CALL (800.622.2255) or visit the organization's Web site at www.ncadd.org.
